

BSO and Nova Southeastern Public Safety Partnership: Bridging Theory and Practice

By Leslie Taylor, Ph.D.

community control and communications dispatch – function as a “research lab” for joint collaboration. Projects have been undertaken or are underway in reducing juvenile delinquency, diverting mentally ill detainees to treatment centers, as well as researching stress in police, detention officers and communication dispatchers.

Research and collaboration undertaken within these areas have directly benefitted the community and improved best practices within the agency.

The work performed by public-safety agencies generally touches the lives of every resident in the communities they serve. In this partnership, the community benefits from the education and training of first responders and public-safety employees. Furthermore, the community’s quality of life is improved when real-life and practical solutions are identified to address complex issues.

Agencies such as the BSO are being required to incorporate evidence-based practices in the delivery of services, and research is necessary to fulfill such requirements. One of the partnership’s successes that demonstrates how dramatic change can be brought about is the establishment of “Freedom House,” an initiative that will divert about 400 individuals with mental illness and co-occurring disorders to a treatment facility annually.

Jails have become the largest providers of mental health care, creating a heavy financial burden on agencies and their communities. This diversion program – a direct result of collaborative research with NSU and Henderson Mental Health Center – provides treatment options in a safe house for offenders, instead of in jail. The program is rehabilitative, cost effective and provides tangible impact on the operations of the Broward jail, residents in the program and the overall community.

The partnership’s main goal is to find creative solutions for problems within the agency and in the community through research and joint initiatives. We are excited about the immense contribution, the added value and the benefits of this collaboration in improving the quality of life for public-safety employees and the community in general.
